What Should I Feed My Dog?

www.petsmart.com

Three basic questions
to help you choose quality food

There are so many kinds of dog food on the market that choosing the right one can seem confusing. To narrow down your choices, ask these three questions:

1. How old is my dog?

Puppies (under a year), adults (one to eight years old) and seniors (eight years and older) have different nutritional needs. Active, growing dogs need more calories, while older dogs may benefit from ingredients meant to support their aging joints.

2. What breed is my dog?

For very large or very small dogs, consider food made specifically for their size. Size-specific food is customized for the energy needs of big or little dogs and often has pieces designed to fit better in a dog's large (or tiny) mouth. Look on the package for designations such as "large breed," "small breed" or "toy breed."

3. Does my dog have health issues?

A special diet may be best for dogs with health needs like food sensitivities or weight problems. There are also foods made to address dental problems as well as other conditions.

Choose quality ingredients

Now that you've got a general idea of what to feed your pet, look for brands that offer high-quality ingredients. Although premium brands can cost more than bargain brands, the payoff is that these foods deliver more of the nutrients your pet needs. (Another upside: Better absorption may mean your dog's stools will be smaller and firmer.)

Premium dog food will include meat for protein, vitamin-packed vegetables and fruit, and omega fatty acids for a shiny coat. It's also likely to have fewer fillers such as corn, wheat and soy.

Water Safety Tips for Dogs

Safely enjoy the pool,
lake or ocean with your dog

Dogs are natural swimmers, right? Actually, no they aren't! Dogs instinctively tread water if they fall in — it's called dog paddling — but that isn't the same as knowing how to swim. That's why all dogs need to be properly introduced to water.

The first, most crucial step is obedience training, because a dog who disobeys you on land will definitely defy you in the pool, lake or ocean. After that, follow this advice to keep your pet healthy and happy.

Protect against drowning

Know your dog. Some breeds are better suited for water than others. Breeds with short snouts, including pugs, English bulldogs and Boston terriers, aren't built for swimming and will likely be better off on dry land.

Never throw a dog into a body of water.

Never leave a dog unattended around water. (Be sure to fence in your pool if you have one.)

If you have a pool, show your dog how to get out using the steps. The two of you should practice exiting the pool together until your dog understands where the exits are and how to get out if they accidentally fall in.

Swimming is tiring and a pooped pooch is more susceptible to drowning. It's up to you to get your dog out of the water every so often for a rest.

Invest in a doggie life vest and take a dog CPR class.

Other water health tips

Don't let your dog drink swimming water. Lakes and rivers can host parasites and algae, pool water is chlorinated, and ocean water is salty; none of these are good for your dog. Keep a dish of fresh water available for your pet.

Rinse off dogs after swimming to get rid of chlorine and salt water, which can dry their skin. Dry their ears afterward, too, to help prevent infection.
